on Adenauer's characterization of the government as "decidedly embittered" and "irreconcilable" with the "new" government in Berlin, and Leibnitz' letter to Hitler, in which he states that "the same old enemies are still here," and that "we must not give up our fight for the recovery of our rights." These remarks, as due to the Adenauer government, were made by the Greek government, according to Verwoerd, during the 1939-40 crisis of refugee through Turkey from Nazi Germany, when the Adenauer government demanded that Turkey grant political asylum to the refugees, and did not do so, forcing Verwoerd to make a speech in the Diet, in which he asserted that the Adenauer government had been responsible for the pressure on Adenauer to do whatever was required to prevent the Greek government from taking steps to help the refugees. He should have known that the Adenauer government would have done nothing to help the refugees, and that the German government should have done very little.
